peculiar private monopoly of narration in all matters connected with "his own brief diplomatic career" is no less novel than absurd. The labors of diplomats, being paid for, however insufficiently, by the public, have always been regarded as public property.

We have thus gone through, one by one, with Mr. Lawrence's charges against Mr. Dana. We have conclusively exhibited the groundlessness of some of them, the folly of others. Mr. Dana's reputation has nothing to fear from such an assault. The blow recoils with terrible force upon the assailant.
